UNITED STATES CENSUS OF 1900

IN June, 1900, the twelfth census of the United States was taken. The population (exclusive of 129,518 Indians, not taxed), according to the official count, was 76,303,387, an increase of 12,937,008, or 20.7 per cent, over that of 1890. The average density of population per square mile was 25.6. The center of population is computed to be at a point 6 miles southeast of Columbus, Ind., in lat. 39° 9' 36" N., and lon. 85° 48' 54" W., having moved 14 miles westward during the decade. Of the total population 28,411,698, or 37.3 per cent, lived in the 1,158 cities of 4,000 inhabitants or more. There were 19 cities with more than 200,000 inhabitants, 38 with more than 100,000, 78 with more than 50,000, and 161 with more than 25,000. The following tables show the population of the States by counties in 1890 and 1900, together with the population of the county-towns in 1900, and the population of all the incorporated towns, cities, villages, and boroughs of the United States with more than 1,000 population in 1900:

Mackerel-gull: a popular name for the terns (see TERN), given them on account of their habit of hovering over schools of mackerel in search of fish driven to the surface, or to pick up scraps of food left by the fishes.

MacKey, ALBERT GALLATIN, M. D.: writer on Freemasonry; b. in Charleston, S. C., in 1807; graduated in 1832 at the Medical College of South Carolina, where he became demonstrator of anatomy in 1838, but in 1844 devoted himself wholly to literature, chiefly in connection with Masonry. He wrote for several periodicals in Charleston; published a Lexicon of Freemasonry (1845); The Mystic Tie (1849); Principles of Masonic Law (1856); The Book of the Chapter (1858); Text-book of Masonic Jurisprudence (1859); Cryptic Masonry and Masonic Ritualist (1867); The Symbolisms of Freemasonry (1868); and Manual of the Lodge (1870). He also edited the Ahiman Rezon, or Book of Constitutions of the Grand Lodge of Ancient Freemasonry of South Carolina. He established a Masonic monthly in Charleston in 1850, and a quarterly in 1858; lectured on the Middle Ages, and was active in politics after the civil war. A much enlarged edition of the Lexicon appeared in 1875, called Encyclopedia of Freemasonry. D. June 20, 1881.

McKibbin, CHAMBERS: See the Appendix.

Mackinac, mak-i-naw: village; Mackinac co., Mich. (for location see map of Michigan, ref. 2-1); on the Mackinac island, in Lake Huron, N. E. of Mackinac Strait, which connects Lake Huron with Lake Michigan; nearest railway, the Duluth, S. Shore and Atlantic; 300 miles by water N. by W. of Detroit. The island, which is 3 miles long by 2 miles wide, contains a post-office and a telegraph-station, and was a place of much importance in the colonial period. It was settled by the French; made a missionary station in 1669; captured and its inhabitants massacred by Pontiac in 1763; and captured by the British in 1812. The island is a popular summer resort, has a good harbor, and has large exports of fish. Pop. of village (1890) 750; (1900) 665.

McKinley, WILLIAM, twenty-fifth President of the U. S.; b. in Niles, Trumbull co., Ohio, Jan. 29, 1843; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., Sept. 14, 1901. The long low two-story frame building in which he was born was a country store and dwelling. His birthplace stood until late in 1895, when it was torn down, and the hard woods of the mantels and baseboards were made into canes and sold among his admirers. Authentic records trace the McKinleys to Scotland to 1547, and it is believed that James McKinley, "the trooper," was one of William's ancestors. The crest of the McKinley clan was a mailed hand holding an olive branch, and its motto "Not too much." The Rev. James McKinley—mentioned by Burns in his poems The Ordination and Tam Samson's Elegy—was a kinsman, contemporary with the McKinleys of the Revolution in this country. The change in spelling the final syllable from a to e is explained by the reply that Major McKinley himself made at a meeting of the descendants of the clan in Chicago, in 1893, to a lady of the same name but spelled in the old way. "Your ancestors of the McKinley clan," said he, "came to this country directly from Scotland, while mine came from the north of Ireland; but we are probably of the same original Covenant stock." About 1743 one of the Scotch-Irish McKinleys settled in Chancetown Township, York co., Pa., where his son David (the McKinley of the Revolution, great-grandfather of the President) was born in May, 1755. He served as a private in the Pennsylvania line about two years, and participated in the capture of Paulus Hook and in the engagements of Amboy and Chester Hill. After the Revolution he resided in Westmoreland and Chester counties, Pa., until 1814, when he went to Ohio, where he died in 1840, at the age of eighty-five. James McKinley, son of David, moved to Columbiana co., Ohio, in 1809, and in that State the family has since mainly resided, although James and his wife, who died on the same day, are buried in the same grave at South Bend, Ind. The grandmother of the President, Mary Rose, came from a Puritan family that fled from England to Holland and emigrated to Pennsylvania with William Penn. Her father, Andrew Rose, Jr., was also a patriot of the Revolution, who participated in the battle of Monmouth and manufactured ammunition for the American army. William McKinley, Sr., father of the President, born in Mercer co., Pa., in 1807, married in 1829 Nancy Campbell Allison, of Columbiana co., Ohio, whose father, Abner Allison, was of English extraction, and her mother, Ann Campbell, of Scotch-German. Of their nine children, William was the seventh. Both the grandfather and the father of the President were iron manufacturers. His father was a devout Methodist, a staunch Whig and Republican, and an ardent advocate of a protective tariff. He died in November, 1892. The mother of the President died Dec. 12, 1897.

Birthplace of William McKinley, Niles, Ohio.

William received his first education in the public schools of Niles, but when he was nine years old the family removed to Poland, Ohio, where he studied at Union Seminary until he was seventeen. He excelled in mathematics and the languages, and was the best equipped of all the students in debating public questions of the day. In 1860 he entered the junior class of Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa. Intense application to his studies weakened his system and he was obliged to return home for rest. But as soon as he was able, he sought a change by engaging as a teacher in the public schools. A friend says of him at this time: "He was always studying, studying—studying all the time." He was fond of athletic sports, and was a good horseman. At the age of sixteen he became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Poland, and was noted for his study of the Bible and his interest in discussions in the Bible class. When the civil war broke out, in the spring of 1861, he was a clerk in the Poland post-office, and he was among the first to enlist. He went with the recruits to Columbus, and was mustered in as a private in Company E of the Twenty-third Ohio Infantry, June 11, 1861. This regiment numbered among its field and staff officers Gen. William S. Rosecrans, Gen. E. Parker Scammon, Gen. Rutherford B. Hayes, Gen. James M. Comly, minister to Hawaii, Col. Stanley Matthews, United States Senator and Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, Gen. Russell Hastings, Dr. Joseph T. Webb, a noted surgeon, and Robert P. Kennedy and William C. Lyon, Lieutenant-Governors of Ohio. From the date of its organization, June 1, 1861, to the time it was mustered out, July 26, 1865, its rank and file included 2,095 men, of whom 169 were killed in battle and 107 died of wounds or disease. It was engaged in nineteen battles, marched hundreds of miles, endured great privation, and encountered all the perils and hardships of war with bravery and fidelity.

Young McKinley found the drill, discipline, and out-of-door life of the soldier beneficial to his health, and emerged from his four years' arduous service stronger than when he entered the army. Concerning this period of his life, he said: "I always look back with pleasure upon the fourteen months I served in the ranks. They taught me a great deal. I was but a schoolboy when I went into the army, and that first year was a formative period in my life, during which I learned much of men and facts. I have always been glad that I entered the service as a private and served those months in that capacity." He participated in all the early engagements in West Virginia. The first of these was at Carnifex Ferry, Sept. 10, 1861, and its effects were of much consequence to the regiment. "It gave the boys confidence in themselves," he once said, "and faith in their commander. We learned that we could fight and whip the enemy on their own ground." In the winter's camp at Fayetteville he received his first promotion, commissary sergeant, Apr. 15, 1862. "Young as McKinley was," said ex-President Hayes in 1891, "we soon found that in business and executive ability he was of rare capacity, of unusual and surpassing capacity, for a boy of his age. When battles were fought or a service to be performed in warlike things, he always took his place. When I became commander of the regiment, he soon came to be on my staff, and he remained on my staff for one or two years, so that I did literally and in fact know him like a book and love him like a brother." He participated in the engagements at Clark's Hollow, May 1, and Princeton, May 15, 1862. In the summer the regiment went to Washington, and a few days after its arrival joined McClellan's forces and drove the enemy out of Frederick, Md. On Sept. 14 and 17 it participated in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam. The Twenty-third made three successful charges in the first of these battles, and lost heavily in both. "During the day [at South Mountain] the Twenty-third," says Whitelaw Reid in Ohio in the War, "lost nearly 200 men, of whom almost one-fourth were killed on the field or afterward died of their wounds. Only seven men were unaccounted for at the roll-call after the action. The colors of the regiment were riddled, and the blue field almost completely carried away by shells and bullets." At Antietam the regiment held its position in the hottest of the fight. It was engaged from dawn until nearly night without food or refreshment of any sort, save that brought by the youngest of the comrades. Sergeant McKinley was in charge of the commissary department of his brigade, and necessarily his post of duty was with the supplies, about two miles from the firing line where his famished comrades were fighting to hold their advanced position. As is the case in all hot fights, some stragglers found their way back to the supplies, and these McKinley utilized to get together provisions and coffee and carry them to the front. It was nearly dark when suddenly there was tremendous cheering along the front of the Twenty-third Ohio. McKinley had filled two wagons, and in the midst of the desperate fight had hurried the cans of coffee and other supplies to his comrades, who took fresh courage after the refreshment. The mules of one wagon became disabled under the terrific fire, but this boy of nineteen pushed on and got the other wagon safely through to the regiment. Col. Hayes was badly wounded at South Mountain, and when he went home to Ohio he told Gov. Todd the story. "Let McKinley be promoted to lieutenant," said the Governor, and it was accordingly done, his commission dating from Sept. 24, 1862. In his speech at the Lakeside Chautauqua, in 1891, Gen. Hayes described this incident and said: "From Sergeant McKinley's hand every man in the regiment was served with hot coffee and warm meats, a thing which had never occurred under similar circumstances in any other army in the world. He passed under fire and delivered with his own hands these things so essential for the men for whom he was laboring."

The regiment returned to winter quarters near Parkersburg. During the year it had marched more than 600 miles. It intercepted the Confederate raider John Morgan at Buffington's Ford, July 19, 1863, and assisted in his capture. In May, 1864, it took part in the battle of Cloyd's Mountain, from whose summit the enemy was driven, after a long march by what was supposed to be an impassable route. "It was a rough and trying march over mountains and through deep ravines and dense woods," McKinley once described it, "with snows and rains that would have checked the advance of any but the most determined. We penetrated a country where guerrillas were abundant, where it was not an unusual thing for our men to be shot from the underbrush—murdered in cold blood."

He had been promoted to first lieutenant, Feb. 7, 1863, and under his leadership his company was the first to scramble over the enemy's fortifications and silence their guns. His only reference to this achievement is to be found in his address upon President Hayes, at Delaware, Ohio, in 1893. "The advance across the meadow, in full sight of the enemy," said McKinley, "and in range of their guns, through the creek, and up over the ridge, was magnificently executed, and the hand-to-hand combat in the fort was as desperate as any during the war. Still another charge was made, and the enemy again driven back. On we hurried to Dublin depot, on the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, burning the bridges there, tearing up the track, and rendering the railroad useless. There the New River bridge was destroyed, and then, with frequent encounters, we went to Staunton, Va." They again advanced until within two miles of Lynchburg, where the regiment camped so near the enemy that men of both sides took rails for their fires from the same fence. Four days later they were attacked by a superior force, which they at first repelled, but were compelled to retire. "All our commissary supplies were consumed," says McKinley; "but almost without food we marched and fought our way back, closely pursued by the enemy." It began on June 19, near Lynchburg, and continued until June 27, when a supply train was reached on Big Sewell Mountain, and there, to quote Col. Hayes's diary, "we stopped and ate, marched and ate, camped about dark, and ate all night." In these nine days the Twenty-third marched 180 miles, fighting nearly all the time. They had crossed three ranges of the Alleghenies four times, the ranges of the Blue Ridge twice, and marched several times all day and all night without sleep. In this memorable expedition the Twenty-third participated in engagements at Cloyd's Mountain, New River Bridge, Buffalo Gap, Lexington, Buchanan, Otter Creek, Lynchburg, and Buford's Gap, and finally got back to camp and fought under Gen. Crook in the battle of Kernstown, near Winchester, July 24, 1864. Lieut. McKinley had conducted himself with gallantry in every emergency, and at Winchester won additional honors. Crook's army was attacked by the whole of Early's, the National forces being 6,000 strong, and the Confederate 20,000. Hayes had charge of the first brigade on the extreme right, and was soon attacked with such fury that he was obliged to fall back. The movement was successfully executed, except that the Thirteenth West Virginia Regiment failed to retire and was in imminent danger of capture. McKinley was directed to go and bring it away, and, putting spurs to his horse, he galloped obliquely toward the advancing enemy. Russell Hastings, then major of the Twenty-third, said: "None of us expected to see him again as we watched him push his horse through the open fields, over fences and across ditches, while the fire from the enemy poured upon him, with shells exploding around and over him. Once he was completely enveloped in the smoke of an exploding shell, and we thought he had gone down; but no, out of this smoke emerged his wiry little brown horse, with McKinley still firmly seated and erect as a hussar. Now he had passed under cover from the enemy's fire, and a sense of relief came to us all. McKinley gave the colonel the orders to fall back, and added, 'I supposed you would go to the rear without orders.' The colonel replied: 'I was about concluding I would retire, and am now ready to go wherever you lead; but, lieutenant, I p'intedly believe I will give them fellows a volley or two before I go.' McKinley commanded, 'Then up and at them as quickly as possible,' and as the regiment arose to its feet the enemy came into full view. Col. Brown's boys gave them a crushing volley, and, following it with a rattling fire, retreated toward some woods in their rear. As Crook and Hayes saw the regiment safely off, they turned, and following the column, with it moved slowly to the rear, down the Winchester pike. At a point near Winchester, McKinley brought the regiment to the column and its place in the brigade." Continuing the retreat, they came upon a battery of artillery of four guns and their caissons, which had been left in the way. McKinley asked permission to bring it off, but his superior officers thought it impossible, owing to the exhausted condition of the men. "The Twenty-third will do it," said McKinley, and called for volunteers. Every man of his company stepped out, and the guns were hauled off to a place of safety. The next day, July 25, 1864, McKinley was promoted to captain.

The brigade continued its fighting up and down the Shenandoah valley, skirmishes occurring almost daily. A fierce engagement took place at Berryville, Sept. 3, 1864, in which Capt. McKinley's horse was shot under him, and the fighting between Crook's and Longstreet's forces continued until nightfall, when both commanders withdrew their men.

Hayes dispatched McKinley for this purpose with the proper orders, but he encountered a strange situation, which is best described in his own words: "This engagement," he once said, "will not soon be forgotten. It was a brilliant scene; the heavens were illuminated by the flashes of our own and the enemy's guns. Later, when both armies determined to retire, it became my duty to direct a regiment at some distance from the others to move. A stranger and in the darkness, I knew nothing of the country. When I started on my mission some one on the other side was doing just what I was, as I could tell from what I could hear. I had not gone far when I was halted by a sentinel with 'Who comes thar?' The distinct Southern brogue was warning enough, and I hastened the other way. Very soon I was stopped by a voice with a shrill Western accent demanding, 'Who comes there?' and recognized friends. I gave the countersign, and soon had the regiment moving."

At Opquan and Fisher's Hill McKinley again distinguished himself. In the former battle as an aide on Gen. Crook's staff, he was sent with an order to Gen. Isaac H. Duval to move his command quickly to a position on the right of the Sixth Corps; but Duval, not knowing the topography of the country, asked the young aide, "By what route shall I move my command?" Capt. McKinley was without definite orders or knowledge of the country, but having a general idea of the direction of the water courses and location of the troops, replied, "I would move up this creek." Duval then said, "I shall not move without definite orders." McKinley knew that any delay was hazardous, and so, acting on his own view, at once replied: "This is a case of great emergency, general, and so I order you, by command of Gen. Crook, to move your command on the road up this ravine to a position on the right of the army." The movement proved exactly right; Duval's command was soon in position, and it drove the enemy from their works and contributed to the victory of the day.

In describing the fight at Fisher's Hill, McKinley called it "one of the most brilliant of the many brilliant achievements of Gen. George Crook. It was a flank movement through the mountains and woods to the enemy's right. Never did troops advance with greater difficulty, on what appeared to be an impassable route, over the mountain side, where it seemed the foot of man had never trod. Hayes led the charge down the gorge and up the hill. He led repeated charges. I can see him now, encouraging his men to make another and still another charge—until we had captured the whole of the enemy's works and every piece of their artillery. Nothing was more brilliant or decisive during the entire war, considering the numbers in the affair."

Soon after this battle the regiment was detailed as train guard to Martinsburg and marched to Winchester, where a brigade of the enemy's cavalry was reported to be. On the march (Oct. 11) the men voted in the election that decided whether the war should be continued to success or abandoned and acknowledged a failure. Capt. McKinley's first ballot was cast for Lincoln.

On the morning of Oct. 19, 1864, the National forces at Cedar Creek were surprised by Early's army, and for a time were thrown into confusion and routed. Gen. Sheridan had been at Winchester, "20 miles away," but, hearing the roar of the artillery, rode rapidly to the scene of action. On working to the front, he met Capt. McKinley, who, with other officers, had been striving to keep the men in line and establish a position. He had just returned from planting a battery. "Where's Crook?" asked Sheridan. Capt. McKinley turned, and together they rode off to find the general, and as Sheridan dashed down the line he yelled to the troops, and their enthusiastic cheers: "Never mind, boys, we'll whip them yet. We'll sleep in our quarters to-night." Gens. Crook and Wright soon came up and briefly described the events of the morning to Sheridan, and under his leadership the National forces eagerly attacked and badly defeated the confident enemy.

A short time after this battle a successful cavalry raid by the Confederates on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, at New Creek, caused Gen. Crook to move one of his divisions to that place. He admired Capt. McKinley and took him along. Here Gens. Crook and Kelley were captured, and Gen. Hancock took charge of the department. He retained McKinley on his staff several months. McKinley was then assigned as acting assistant adjutant general on the staff of Gen. Samuel S. Carroll, commanding the Veteran Reserve Corps at Washington, where he remained through that exciting period which included the surrender of Lee to Grant at Appomattox and the assassination of Lincoln. Just a month before this tragedy, or on Mar. 14, 1865, he had received from the President a commission as major by brevet in the volunteer U. S. army, "for gallant and meritorious services at the battles of Opquan, Cedar Creek, and Fisher's Hill," signed "A. Lincoln." He participated in the last great act of the war, the final grand review in Washington, where the armies of Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan were united in May, 1865, with the same modest department that had characterized his entrance into the service in 1861. He was urged to remain in the army, but, wisely deferring to the judgment of his father, he was mustered out July 26, 1865, and returned to Poland, where the family was again reunited, his younger brother, Abner, having been a volunteer in the National army. He never was absent a day from his command on sick leave; he had only one short furlough in his four years of service; he never asked or sought promotion; he was present and active in every engagement in which his regiment participated; and he performed bravely and well every duty assigned him. On his return to Poland with his old company, a complimentary dinner was given to them, and he was selected to respond to the welcoming address, which he did in a speech of rare eloquence.

He at once began the study of law under the preceptorship of Judge Charles E. Glidden and his partner, David M. Wilson, of Youngstown, Ohio, applying himself diligently during the week at Poland, and going to their office on Mondays for review and examination. He completed his course at the law school in Albany, N. Y., and in Mar., 1867, was admitted to the bar at Warren, Ohio. On the advice of his elder sister, Anna, he settled in Canton, Ohio, where she was for many years a teacher in the public schools. Here he soon attracted attention, and by his exemplary life and devotion to his profession achieved success at the bar and great popularity. In the autumn of 1867 he made his first political speeches in favor of negro suffrage, a most unpopular doctrine throughout the State. Republican nominations in Stark County were considered empty honors; but when, in 1869, he was placed on the ticket for prosecuting attorney he made an energetic canvass and was elected. He discharged the duties of this trust with fidelity and fearlessness, but in 1871 he failed of re-election by 45 votes. He thereupon resumed his practice, and was remarkably successful.

He married, Jan. 25, 1871, Miss Ida Saxton, daughter of James A. and Catherine De-walt Saxton. Her father was a banker of large means, who, after giving Ida, his youngest daughter, many advantages of education and travel, began her business training as cashier in his bank. At this time Mr. McKinley was superintendent of the Methodist Sunday-school, and his bride was a teacher in the Presbyterian. Two daughters were born to them—Katie on Christmas, 1871, and Ida in 1873—but both were lost in early childhood. Mrs. McKinley's health, not robust at any time, never has rallied from the terrible blow of these two deaths in quick succession. Her comfort, her wish, her happiness, under every conceivable circumstance, was her husband's first thought and constant concern. At home no hour passed that he did not see her; and she rewarded this homage with all the intensity of a proud, ardent, unselfish affection.

In the gubernatorial campaign between Hayes and Allen, in 1875, at the height of the greenback craze, he made numerous effective speeches in favor of honest money and the resumption of specie payments. The Hon. Stewart L. Woodford, of New York, spoke at Canton that autumn, and McKinley was prevailed upon to close the meeting. Animated by the eloquence of their visitor, McKinley captivated both the audience and the orator who had preceded him. On his return to Columbus, Mr. Woodford made it a point to see the State Committee and urge them to put McKinley upon their list of speakers. They had not heard of him before, but they put him on the list. The next year, 1876, McKinley was nominated for Congress and was elected over Leslie L. Lanborn by 3,300 majority. During the progress of the canvass, while visiting the Exposition in Philadelphia, he was introduced by James G. Blaine to a great audience at the Union League Club, and scored so great a success that he was at once in demand throughout the country. He spoke hundreds of times, and in almost every State and Territory, to more of his fellow-countrymen than ever were addressed by any other public man in the history of the republic. He was more like Webster in personal appearance, style, and delivery than any other American orator.

He entered Congress on the day when his old colonel assumed the presidency. He delivered a notable address that year at the dedication of a soldiers' monument at Fremont, Ohio. But he devoted himself strictly to his congressional duties, and on Apr. 15, 1878, made a speech in opposition to what was known as "the Wood tariff bill," from its author, Fernando Wood, of New York, the first of the measures designed (according to its opponents) to cripple our protective system. He not only exposed the incongruities and absurdities of the proposed law, but the impolicy and recklessness of such legislation, and, although the House was Democratic, the measure was postponed until the short session, and then was abandoned altogether. His speech was widely circulated by the Republican Congressional Committee. Mr. Blaine, in his "Twenty Years of Congress," says, in reviewing the Forty-fifth Congress: "William McKinley, Jr., entered from the Canton district. The interests of his constituency and his own bent of mind led him to the study of industrial questions, and he was soon recognized in the House as one of the most thorough statisticians and one of the ablest defenders of the doctrine of protection."

In 1877 Ohio went strongly Democratic, and the Legislature gerrymandered the State, so that McKinley found himself confronted by an adverse majority of 2,580 in a new district. His opponent was Gen. Aquila Wiley, who had lost a leg in the National Army, and was competent and worthy. McKinley entered the canvass with great energy, and after a thorough discussion of the issues in every part of the district, was re-elected to Congress by 1,234 majority. As chairman of the Republican State Convention of Ohio of 1880, he made an address devoted principally to the Federal election laws. Speaker Randall gave him a place on the Judiciary Committee, and in December, 1880, appointed him to succeed Garfield as a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

The Ohio Legislature of 1880 restored his old congressional district, and he was unanimously nominated to the Forty-seventh Congress. His election was assured, but he made a vigorous canvass, and was chosen over Leroy D. Thoman by 3,571 majority. He was chosen by the Chicago convention as the Ohio member of the Republican National Committee, and accompanied Gen. Garfield on his speaking tour through New York. He opened the State campaign at Portsmouth, Ohio, in July, and also spoke in Maine, Indiana, Illinois, and other States.

The Forty-seventh Congress was Republican, and it proceeded to revise the tariff. After much discussion it was agreed to constitute a commission, who should report at the next session. In the debate on this project McKinley delivered an interesting speech, Apr. 6, 1882, in which, while not giving his unqualified approval to the creation of a commission, he insisted that a protective policy should never for an instant be abandoned or impaired.

The elections of 1882 occurred while the tariff commission was still holding its sessions, and the Republicans were defeated. The Democracy carried Ohio by 19,000, and elected 13 of the 21 congressmen. McKinley had been re-nominated, after a sharp contest, and was elected by eight votes over his Democratic competitor, Jonathan H. Wallace. At the short session an exhaustive report by the tariff commission was submitted, and from this the Ways and Means Committee framed and promptly introduced a bill reducing existing duties, on the average, about 20 per cent. McKinley supported this measure in an explanatory and argumentative speech, Jan. 27, 1883, but it was evident from the start that it could not become a law, and the Senate substitute was enacted instead. In contrasting the respective advantages of the two revenue systems, he said: "If labor was degraded on this side of the Atlantic as on the other, we might compete with the best manufacturers of the world in any market. No lover of his race, no friend of humanity, wants reduced wages. I do not speak for capital. Capital can take care of itself. Rob it of its profits in any of the so-called protected industries, and it will seek other avenues of investment and profit. I speak for the workmen of my district, the workmen of Ohio, and of the country." Here Mr. Springer, of Illinois, interjected: "They did not speak for you very largely at the last election." McKinley replied, amid great applause on both sides of the Chamber: "Ah, my friend, my fidelity to my constituents is not measured by the support they give me! I have convictions upon this subject which I would not surrender or refrain from advocating if 10,000 majority had been entered against me." He delivered a speech on the Morrison tariff bill, Apr. 30, 1884, which was everywhere accepted as the strongest and most effective argument made against it. At the conclusion of the general debate, May 6, 41 Democrats, under the leadership of Mr. Randall, voted with the Republicans to defeat the bill.

At the Ohio Republican State Convention of that year, 1884, McKinley presided, and was unanimously elected a delegate at large to the National convention. He disliked to oppose Senator Sherman, but he was an avowed supporter of Mr. Blaine for the presidency, and did much to further his nomination. He served on the Committee on Platform, drafted its tariff planks, and read it to the convention. In the campaign he was equally active and prominent. The Democrats had carried the Ohio Legislature in 1883, and he was again gerrymandered into a district supposed to be strongly against him. He accepted a renomination, made a diligent canvass, and defeated David K. Paige, then in Congress, by 2,000 majority. He accompanied Mr. Blaine on his Western tour, speaking constantly with him from the same car or platform, and, after the October election in Ohio, devoted his time to the campaign in West Virginia and New York.

In the Ohio gubernatorial canvass of 1885 Major McKinley was equally active, conspicuous, and popular. He also went to Virginia in October and spoke for Mahone and Wise at Petersburg, urging the people of the Old Dominion to declare for protection as the best promoter of their material prosperity. "Make it possible," said he, "to break down the prejudices of the past. Get out from under your ancestral tree. Recognize and give force to the Constitution, permit every man to vote for the party of his choice, and have his ballot honestly counted. Push to the front where you belong as a State and a people. Be assured that the Republicans of the North harbor no resentments—only ask for the results of the war. They wish you the highest prosperity and greatest development." His district had been restored in 1886, and he was again unanimously nominated for Congress for the sixth time, and elected by 2,550 majority over Wallace H. Phelps.

In Congress, Apr. 2, 1886, he made a notable speech on arbitration as the best means of settling labor disputes. "I believe in arbitration as a principle," said he. "I believe it should prevail in the settlement of international differences. It represents a higher civilization than the arbitrament of war. I believe it is in close accord with the best thought and sentiment of mankind; I believe it is the true way of settling differences between labor and capital; I believe it will bring both to a better understanding, uniting them closer in interest and promoting better relations, avoiding force, avoiding unjust exactions and oppression, avoiding the loss of earnings to labor, avoiding disturbances to trade and transportation; and if this House can contribute in the smallest measure, by legislative expression, or otherwise, to these ends, it will deserve and receive the gratitude of all men who love peace, good order, justice, and fair play."

The State of Ohio designated James A. Garfield as one of the two of her sons, "illustrious for their heroic renown or distinguished by civic or military services," whose statues should be placed in the Statuary Hall at the Capitol, and he delivered a memorial address on the occasion of its presentation to Congress, Jan. 19, 1886. "Great in dealing with all public questions," he said of Garfield, "dull and commonplace in none, to me he was the strongest, broadest, and bravest when he spoke for honest money, the fulfillment of the Nation's promises, the resumption of specie payments, and the maintenance of the public faith. He contributed his share, in full measure, to secure National honesty, and preserve inviolate our National honor. None did more, few, if any, so much to bring the Government back to a sound, stable, and constitutional money. He was a very giant in those memorable struggles." At the second session, Feb. 16, 1887, he delivered a memorial address on Gen. John A. Logan, of Illinois, much admired for its beauty and tenderness. "The old soldiers will miss him," said he; "the mighty oak around which their hearts were entwined, to which their hopes clung, has fallen. The veterans have lost their steady friend, Congress one of its able counselors, the Republican party one of its great leaders, the country one of its noble defenders."

He advocated the passage of the dependent pension bill, Feb. 24, over President Cleveland's veto, as a "simple act of justice," and "the instinct of a decent humanity and our Christian civilization."

The attention not only of Congress, but of the country, was sharply arrested by Mr. Cleveland's third annual message, Dec. 6, 1887, for it was devoted to an assault on the protective tariff laws, upon which he was previously thought to hold a conservative position. A bill was immediately introduced in the House by Mr. Mills, embodying the President's views and policy, and the two parties were arrayed in support or opposition to it. Then occurred a most remarkable debate. Absenting himself from Congress a few days, Mr. McKinley returned to Canton, Dec. 13, 1887, and delivered a masterly address before the Ohio State Grange on "The American Farmer." In this he declared against alien landholding, and advised his hearers to remain true to their faith in protection. "We must avoid in this country," said he, "the holding of large tracts of land by nonresident owners for speculative purposes, and set our faces against alien landholding in small or large tracts. Our public domain must be rededicated to our own people, and neither foreign syndicates nor domestic corporations must be permitted to divert it from the hallowed purpose of actual settlement and cultivation by real farmers." He also went to Boston and discussed before the Home Market Club, Feb. 9, 1888, the question of "free raw material," upon which the majority in the House counted confidently to divide their Republican opponents, with such breadth and force that the doctrine was abandoned in New England, where it was supposed to be strongest.

On Feb. 29 he addressed the House on the bill to regulate the purchase of Government bonds, not so much in opposition to the measure, for he heartily favored their retirement as speedily as possible, but because of the wrong impression sought to be conveyed. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury, he said, had always had abundant authority to buy bonds as fast as the revenues admitted, and "their ulterior motive in piling up a surplus of $60,000,000 in the Treasury, without retiring any of them, was evidently for the purpose of creating a condition of things in the country which would get up a scare and stampeade against the protective system." He was willing to do anything to help "put in circulation the millions they had been hoarding, and pay off that amount of Government debt, but he would first have the country understand why the Administration had not done this long ago."

On April 2 he presented to the House the views of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee on the Mills tariff bill, which he had himself mainly prepared. In concluding this report, they said: "The minority regard this bill not as a revenue reduction measure, but as a direct attempt to fasten upon this country the British policy of free foreign trade. So viewing it, their sense of obligation to the people, and especially the working people employed in manufacturing and agriculture in all sections of our common country, impel them to resist it with all their power. They will assist the majority in every effort to reduce the redundant income of the Government in a direct and practicable way; but every effort of fiscal legislation which will destroy or enfeeble our industries, retard material development, or tend to reduce our labor to the standard of other countries will meet with their persistent and determined opposition."

On May 18, the day the general debate was to close, McKinley delivered what was described at the time as "the most effective and eloquent tariff speech ever heard in Congress." In a well-turned illustration, at the expense of his colleague, Mr. Morse, of Boston, he showed, by exhibiting to the House a suit of clothes purchased at the latter's store, that the claims of Mills as to the prices of woolsens were absurd, and by equal tact he convinced his hearers of the bad policy of our Government importing foreign blankets for the army, at the expense of domestic manufacturers and home labor, for the sake of saving about 30 cents apiece on them. Some of his objections to the bill, as it was then before the House, were so conclusive that its authors felt constrained to amend it in the particulars enumerated. He held that protection was from first to last a contention for labor, whether it should be well paid and independent, as befitted citizens of the republic, or poorly paid and degraded, as was conspicuously the case in governments where its opportunities and privileges were most contracted. "The hope of the country," said he, in conclusion, "is in the ballot. The future, and, as I conceive, the welfare and progress of the republic, the future condition of the wage-earners, depends upon the issue to be settled in November. Americans who love their country must be on guard on that day of supreme concern; it is their duty, their one great opportunity. Parties must be subordinated to the great interests of the masses. No party necessity is great enough to force its adherents against the country's best interests. I care not what in the future may be the party name which stands for this system, which stands for the people, I will follow its flag under whatever designation or leadership, because it is my country's flag and represents its greatness and its glory." Both Congress and the country heartily applauded this speech. The feeling among his colleagues may be shown by an incident of the day. Judge Kelley, the Republican leader of the House, had chosen McKinley to close the debate, but Mr. Haskell had begged that privilege, and McKinley at once conceded it to him. When McKinley sat down, Haskell leaned over his desk, just back of McKinley's, and, clasping the latter's hand enthusiastically, declared, "Major, I shall speak last, but you have closed the debate." The press of the country gave it unusual attention, Republican committees scattered millions of copies of it, and it became a text-book of the campaign.

At the Ohio convention of 1888 McKinley was elected a delegate at large to the Republican National Convention, and took an active part in its proceedings. As chairman of the Committee on Resolutions he had a large share in the preparation of the platform, reported it to the convention, and secured its unanimous adoption. He was from the start the choice of many delegates for President, and when it was ascertained that Mr. Blaine would not accept the nomination, a movement in his favor began. All the Republican congressmen then in Washington, considering his availability greater than that of any name presented, united in a telegram urging his selection. But he had gone to the convention committed to John Sherman, and viewed with abhorrence the idea of himself accepting an honor which he was earnestly seeking for another. The first day's balloting was indecisive, but on Saturday morning it was evident that sentiment was rapidly centering upon him, and this the next roll call soon developed. McKinley leaped upon his chair at the head of the Ohio delegation, and in the hush of the moment was heard by every man in the hall. "I am not insensible to the honor you would do me," he said, "but in the presence of the duty resting upon me I can not remain silent with honor. I can not consistently with the wish of the State whose credentials I bear and which has trusted me; I can not with honorable fidelity to John Sherman, who has trusted me in his cause and with his cause; I can not consistently with my own views of personal integrity, consent, or seem to consent, to permit my name to be used as a candidate before this convention. I would not respect myself if I could find it in my heart to do, or permit to be done, that which could even be ground for any one to suspect that I wavered in my loyalty to Ohio, or my devotion to the chief of her choice, and the chief of mine. I do not request, I demand, that no delegate who would not cast reflection upon me shall cast a ballot for me." The effect on the convention was as he intended; but the pressure from the country for his nomination was by no means abated. The Connecticut and New Jersey delegations both determined to vote for him unanimously; but he went to their rooms and, in the words of a delegate, implored them "almost with tears in his eyes" not to do so. To one who suggested that he had done as noble a thing as was ever known in politics, he simply asked, "Is it such an honorable thing not to do a dishonorable act?" Although Congress remained in session through most of the campaign, he spoke throughout the country as widely and frequently as his official duties admitted. His best address, perhaps, was at Atlanta, Ga., Aug. 21, on the benefits of protection to the South, ever a favorite topic with him. "The protective system must stand as a whole or fall as a whole," he declared. "As Burke said of liberty, it is the clear right of all or of none. It is only perfect when universal. Men of Georgia, upon this great industrial question there should be no North or South. To us of every section the interests of our homes are uppermost; we have not been intrusted with the care of other nations and other peoples. We will not interfere with them; we bid them not to interfere with us. In this conflict, influenced by patriotism, National interest, and National pride, let us be Americans."

He was for the seventh time nominated and elected to Congress in the following November, defeating George P. Kert by 4,100 votes.

In the Ohio campaign of 1889 he made about 60 speeches in half as many counties. One of the best of these was on "Protection and Revenue" before a great audience in Cleveland, Oct. 5. At the organization of the Fifty-first Congress he was a candidate for Speaker, but was beaten on the third ballot in the Republican caucus by Thomas B. Reed. He resumed his place on the Ways and Means Committee, and on the death of Judge Kelley became its chairman.

Thus devolved upon him, at a most critical juncture, the leadership of the House, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, his party having only a nominal majority, and it requiring always heavy concord and co-operation to pass any important measure. The minority had resolved upon a policy of obstruction and delay, declaring they would clog the wheels of legislation, and, by refusing to participate in business, prevent anything being done. They held that, though actually present, they were constructively absent whenever they refused to respond to roll call, and could not then be counted to make up a quorum. The Speaker proceeded nevertheless to count them, and this brought about a bitter contest over the rules of procedure, upon which McKinley spoke (Jan. 30, 1890) with moderation, thoroughness, and strength, and with his usual effectiveness. His argument in favor of the Republican position was pronounced the ablest made, and has been characterized as "more like the brief of a great lawyer than a speech in a heated political controversy." The Republican side had wavered in the first attack of the opposition, but they now rallied solidly to McKinley's support, and the cause was won, the Speaker himself heartily thanking him for his great and timely assistance. On Apr. 24, 1890, he spoke in favor of sustaining the civil-service law, to which there was decided opposition. "The Republican party," said he, "must take no step backward. The merit system is here, and it is here to stay."

On Dec. 17, 1889, he introduced the first important tariff measure of the session—a bill "to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue." Its object, as explained by him, was "to protect the honest importer in the U. S. against the unscrupulous and dishonest importer; to protect American producers and dealers from the undervaluations and frauds that had long been practiced upon them; to take the business of importing out of the hands of dishonest men and place it, as it once was, in the hands of honest agents, factors, and merchants." The bill passed the House "Mar. 5, and the Senate, as amended, Mar. 20, went to a conference committee, and was approved June 10, 1890. It is known as the "customs administration bill." Meanwhile (Apr. 16) he introduced the general tariff measure that has since borne his name, and that for four months had been under constant consideration by the Ways and Means Committee, during which time every interest in the country that had asked for it had had a hearing. All this entailed a burden of work and trouble upon the chairman that it is impossible to conceive, but it was borne with patience and consideration. His speech in support of the measure, May 7, sustained his high reputation, and, despite the many sharp differences of opinion as to the particular schedules or items, its reception by the House proved conclusively that the passage of the bill was assured. The bill was passed by the House on May 21, but was debated for months in the Senate, that body finally passing it, as amended, on Sept. 11. The House accepted the reciprocity amendment, proposed by the Senate, which McKinley had unavailingly supported before the House Committee, the Senate accepted the internal-revenue sections insisted upon by the House, and the bill became a law Oct. 6, 1890. This bill received the support of all the Republicans in Congress who voted upon it, except three. Its passage was hardly effected, however, before the general election occurred, and in this the Republicans were, as anticipated, badly defeated. His own district had been gerrymandered again, so that he had 3,000 majority to overcome. He accepted the nomination for Congress, and entered the fight with the determination to deserve success, even though the odds against him were invincible. His competitor was Hon. John G. Warwick, a wealthy merchant and coal operator, who was ably supported by the strongest Democratic leaders of the country. Despite the fact that the tide of public sentiment was clearly against his party, and that the most outrageous imposition was practiced upon the people in the outcry about the prices of all kinds of goods being advanced by the new tariff, McKinley still ran largely ahead of his ticket and came within 300 of being elected. No Republican had ever received nearly so many votes in the counties composing the district. Immediately after the election a popular movement began in Ohio for his nomination for Governor, and the State convention in June, 1891, made him its candidate by acclamation. In Congress he spoke and voted for the eight-hour law; he advocated efficient antitrust and antiprofit laws; he supported the direct-tax refunding law, in an argument that abounds with pertinent information; and he presented a resolution declaring that nothing in the new tariff law should be held to invalidate our treaty with Hawaii. On the occasion of the seventieth anniversary of the birth of Judge Thurman, at Columbus, in Nov., 1890, Mr. Cleveland spoke upon "American Citizenship," and "made cheapness the theme of his discourse, counting it one of the highest aspirations of American life." McKinley, replying to this address at the Lincoln banquet in Toledo, Feb. 12, 1891, held that such a boon as "cheap coats" meant inevitably "cheap men," with all the evils of cheap and degraded labor. He spoke of the future most confidently, and, while not arrogating to himself undue credit, he in nowise shirked responsibility for the new tariff law, which was then condemned throughout the country by both the Democratic and independent parties and press, as well as by many wavering Republican leaders and journals.

His popularity with the old soldiers was great. He spoke frequently at their National Encampments—at San Francisco, Indianapolis, Washington, and Pittsburg—and made many patriotic addresses by their special request, such as that on "The American Volunteer Soldier," Memorial Day, 1889, in New York, or on "Pensions and the Public Debt," Canton, Ohio, May 30, 1891. He opened the Ohio campaign at Niles, Aug. 22. In this speech, as in every other of the 134 made by him in that campaign, during which he visited all the eighty-eight counties in Ohio but three, and often spoke to three or four audiences at different points in a single day and night, he declared his unalterable opposition both to free trade and free silver. "My opponent, Gov. Campbell," said he, "declared in a recent newspaper interview that, while he had his doubts about it, he was willing to chance the free and unlimited coinage of silver. I am not willing to 'chance it.' Under present conditions, the country can not afford to chance it. We can not gamble with anything so sacred as money, which is the standard and measure of all values. I can imagine nothing which would be more disturbing to our credit and more deranging to our financial affairs than to make this the dumping-ground of the world's silver." McKinley polled the largest vote ever cast for Governor in Ohio. Campbell had been elected in 1889 by 11,000 plurality in a vote of 775,000; McKinley now defeated him by 21,500 in a total of 795,000. His inaugural address, Jan. 11, 1892, was devoted exclusively to State topics, except in its reference to congressional redistricting, in which he advised that "partisanship should be avoided." He declared that "free suffrage was of little service to the citizens if its force could be defeated by legislative machinations in the form of gerrymanders."

Soon after his inauguration as Governor the presidential campaign began, and he was importuned to allow the use of his name as a candidate. To every such suggestion he promptly replied that he believed Gen. Harrison justly entitled to another term, and heartily favored his re-nomination. He was again a delegate at large from Ohio to the national convention, and was its permanent chairman. The opponents of the president persisted in urging his name, and the delegations from Kansas and West Virginia told him that they intended to vote for him. He asked them not to do so, but urged them to support Harrison, and made the same request of every individual delegate who approached him on the subject. His wishes were so well known that no delegate ventured to present his name, knowing he would immediately withdraw it; but when the ballot was taken many persisted in voting for him, the Ohio delegation responding 44 to 2 for him. He at once challenged this vote, from the chair, and put himself on record for Harrison, who on the entire roll call received 535 votes; Blaine, 182; McKinley, 182; Reed, 4; and Lincoln, 1. During the canvass McKinley spoke in Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, and Ohio, to great and enthusiastic audiences. His principal political addresses of the year were those at Ann Arbor, Mich., May 17, to a national convention of college clubs; on "The Triumph of Protection," before the Nebraska Chautauqua at Beatrice, Aug. 2; and on "The Issues of 1892" at Philadelphia, Sept. 23.

The fight was lost, the people seemed to have repudiated protection, and, as in 1890, the law bearing his name, as well as he himself, was the subject of sneers and jests from every quarter. But he lost neither courage nor confidence. He had no apologies or excuses to offer. He had not sought credit for his efforts for protection, and he feared no criticism.

In his first annual message, Jan. 3, 1893, he called attention to the financial condition of the State, enjoined economy in appropriations, and the application of strict business principles in every part of the public service. His sympathy with laboring men is apparent in his recommendation of additional protection to steam and electric railroad employees, and his interest in the problems of municipal government by his approval of what is called the "Federal plan" of administration. On the seventy-first anniversary of the birth of Ulysses S. Grant he delivered an address in Galena, Ill., and on June 20 a memorial address on Rutherford B. Hayes in Delaware, Ohio, both of which were admired for their research and beauty. At the Republican convention in Ohio he was unanimously renominated for Governor, and he was re-elected by an overwhelming majority, the greatest ever recorded with a single exception during the war for any candidate up to that time in the history of the State. His competitor was Lawrence T. Neal, who, as a member of the Committee on Resolutions at the Democratic National Convention of 1892, had written the plank denouncing the new tariff law as "fraud," as "unconstitutional," as a "sham," and as "the culminating atrocity of class legislation." The issues discussed were National, and McKinley's voice was again heard in every locality in the State in earnest condemnation of "those twin heresies, free trade and free silver." In his second annual message he recommended biennial sessions of the Legislature; a revision of the tax laws by a commission created for the purpose; condemned any increase of local taxation and indebtedness; enjoined the necessity for economy; and warned his party, which had elected three-fourths of the Legislature, that the greater its power the vaster were its responsibilities, and the less excusable was needless or reckless legislation.

On Feb. 22, 1894, McKinley delivered an address on the life and public services of George Washington, under the auspices of the Union League Club in the Auditorium at Chicago, which gave much gratification to his friends and admirers. He reluctantly consented to speak in Minneapolis on the tariff question Mar. 28, fearing it would be impossible to procure a representative audience at so early a season. Every county and town in the State was represented, and the large exposition hall in which the National Convention had been held was filled to its utmost capacity by an enthusiastic audience. Beginning at Bangor, Me., Sept. 8, and continuing through the next two months, he was constantly on the platform. The Wilson-Gorman tariff law had just been enacted, and to this he devoted his chief attention.

At Indianapolis, Sept. 26, Gen. Harrison introduced him to an audience such as had never before assembled in that city on the occasion of the opening of a State campaign, in the following felicitous words: "Major McKinley has endeared himself to all by his record as a gallant soldier, battling for the flag. He has honored himself, his State, and the country by his conspicuous services in high legislative and executive places. No man more than he is familiar with the questions that now engage public thought. No man is more able than he lucidly to set them before the people. I do not need to invoke your attention to what he shall say. He will command it." After returning to Ohio to open the State campaign at Findlay, Gov. McKinley set out for the West, and in a series of speeches through Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and again in Ohio, was greeted apparently by the entire populace. He proved himself one of the most remarkable campaigners the country ever has known. His meetings began at daybreak and continued until nightfall or later from his car, or from adjacent platforms, crowds greeting him at every station, and, whether stops had been arranged or not, blocking the track until he appeared and addressed them. He frequently spoke a dozen times a day, and two, three, or four times at night. In his trip through Wisconsin he spoke twenty-three times in sixteen hours. At Chicago the greatest political meeting in the history of the city greeted him; and at daylight he was speeding through Ohio, to conclude the campaign by a tour of his own State. On undertaking the journey he had agreed to make 46 speeches. He made them, and 325 more, in 200 towns. For more than eight weeks he averaged seven speeches a day, ranging in length from ten minutes to an hour; and in this time he traveled over 16,000 miles and addressed 2,000,000 people. Never were more effective speeches delivered, for at every point visited his party achieved phenomenal victories, and it carried the popular branch of Congress by more than a two-third majority.

During the ensuing winter his official duties as Governor were made the more arduous by the prevalence of great distress in the mining districts of the Hocking valley. Gov. McKinley, by appeals to the generous people of the State, raised by voluntary contributions sufficient funds and provisions to meet every case of actual privation, the bulk of the work being done under his personal direction. Several serious outbreaks occurred during his administration, at one time requiring the presence of 3,000 of the National Guard in the field and entailing an outlay of more than $60,000, but this extraordinary expense was met by most advantageous arrangements with private capitalists without the expense and delay of an extra session of the Legislature. On three occasions prisoners were saved from mobs and safely incarcerated in the State prison. His declaration that "lynchings must not be tolerated in Ohio" was literally made good for the first time in any State administration. In Feb., 1895, he delivered notable addresses at Albany, N. Y., before the Unconditional Republican Club, on Lincoln, and at Rochester, on "The Business Man in Politics." In the following April he visited Hartford, Conn., and spoke to a State club that bore his name, and on Memorial Day he delivered an oration on Grant at his tomb in Riverside Park, New York city. In the ensuing political canvass he confined his speaking to Ohio, where, under his leadership, a decisive Republican victory was won.

On the expiration of his term as Governor he returned to his old home at Canton, at which he quietly remained during the next six months, except for a visit to Chicago to address the Marquette Club on Lincoln, Feb. 12, 1896. The country was already ablaze with political excitement, and many friendly advisers urged him not to speak there, as he might give his rivals the advantage of any possible mistake on such an occasion. But he spoke with his usual candor and sincerity, and, using Lincoln's views on the tariff as a text, boldly advanced his views upon what should constitute the Republican platform in the pending campaign. Simultaneously throughout the country began a movement in his favor that proved almost irresistible in every popular convention. State after State and district after district declared for him, until, when the National Convention assembled, he was the choice of more than two-thirds of the delegates for President, on the very platform that four months before he had so clearly outlined. Early in the contest he announced his determination not to engage in the speaking campaign, his only contribution to the cause to be his letter of acceptance. This proved to be one of the strongest papers of its kind in the annals of American politics, but the people were not content. Realizing that they could not induce him to set out on what he thought, an undignified vote-seeking tour of the country, they began to flock by thousands to his modest home in Canton, and here from his doorstep he welcomed and spoke to them. In this manner more than 300 speeches were made from June 19 to Nov. 2, 1896, to the more than 750,000 strangers who came in from all parts of the country for that express purpose. His only departure from home during the campaign was a hasty trip to Cleveland to speak at the centennial anniversary of that city.

Enthusiastic visitors from States as distant as Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Tennessee, Virginia, Maryland, Vermont, and New York came daily to mingle with the shouting thousands from all parts of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Kentucky, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. About thirty States sent such delegations, and more than thirty times as many political clubs and organizations were represented in them. Men of both old parties and both old sections, and equally enthusiastic women and children, with every species of music and decorations. More than 50,000 came at the formal opening of the speaking campaign, and nearly as large crowds on three other great days. They tore down and carried away the wooden fences piecemeal, but were always good-natured and devoted to the leader, whose charming personality attracted them. His speeches were as remarkable for their good sense, originality, versatility, and effectiveness as these pilgrimages were unique and unprecedented. In spite of the enormous strain upon Major McKinley's mental resources, his physical powers were put to the sorest trial, yet no visitor was ever repelled or disappointed. Not only was every delegation satisfied, but the country each morning was given some new text for contemplation and conversation, always patriotic and encouraging to the cause he espoused. Nothing like it was ever before known.

In the Republican National Convention in St. Louis in June, 1896, he was nominated for President on the first ballot, and in the ensuing election he received a popular vote of 7,104,779, and a plurality of 601,554 over his principal opponent, William J. Bryan. In the electoral college McKinley received 271 votes, against 176 for Bryan. The prominent issues in the canvass were the questions of free coinage of silver and restoration of the protective tariff system.

He was inaugurated Mar. 4, 1897, and appointed as his cabinet: John Sherman, Secretary of State; Lyman J. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury; Russell A. Alger, Secretary of War; John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy; Joseph McKenna, Attorney-General; James A. Gary, Postmaster-General; Cornelius N. Bliss, Secretary of the Interior; James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture. Before the term ended Secretary Sherman retired and was succeeded by William R. Day, and he by John Hay. Secretary Alger was succeeded by Elihu Root, Attorney-General McKenna by John W. Griggs, Postmaster-General Gary by Charles Emory Smith, and Secretary Bliss by Ethan Allen Hitchcock.

President McKinley immediately called an extra session of Congress, to meet Mar. 15, for the purpose of revising the tariff. Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, introduced the new measure on the first day of the session, and it was reported from the Ways and Means Committee on the 19th. It passed the House Mar. 31, and the Senate July 7; and after the question of amendments had been settled between the two Houses it received the President's signature July 24. The most important event of this administration was the war with Spain in 1898, which was brought on primarily by the condition of affairs in Cuba, and was perhaps hastened by the destruction of the battleship Maine in Havana harbor (Feb. 15). The President exhausted the resources of diplomacy to prevent the war, but, seeing the probability of it, hastened every preparation for a conflict. The result was the defeat of the Spanish forces in every battle, the end of Spanish dominion in Cuba, and the acquisition by the United States of Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands.

A treaty for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands was signed on June 16, 1897, and was confirmed by the Senate July 7, 1898, and on Aug. 12 the formal transfer of sovereignty was made.

In 1900 the Republican National Convention unanimously renominated President McKinley, and placed Theodore Roosevelt on the ticket for Vice-President. The President's principal opponent, as before, was William J. Bryan, and the issues were the same. In the election, Mr. McKinley received a majority over all of 443,064, and a plurality over Mr. Bryan of $22,280. In the electoral college he received 292 votes, against 155 for Bryan.

At the Pan-American Exposition, held in Buffalo in the summer of 1901, Sept. 5 was set apart as President's day. The attendance was very large, and President McKinley spoke to an audience estimated at 30,000 persons. His address was not only appropriate to the occasion, but significant of his policy for his new term, and it at once attracted attention and excited comment, mainly favorable, all over the world. The chief interest centered in these passages:

"Expositions are the time-keepers of progress. They record the world's advancement. They stimulate the energy, enterprise, and intellect of the people, and quicken human genius. They go into the home. They broaden and brighten the daily life of the people. They open mighty storehouses of information to the student. Every exposition, great or small, has helped to some onward step. . . . Comparison of ideas is always educational and, as such, instructs the brain and hand of man. Friendly rivalry follows, which is the spur to industrial improvement, the inspiration to useful invention and to high endeavor in all departments of human activity. It exacts a study of the wants, comforts, and even the whims of the people, and recognizes the efficacy of high quality and low prices to win their favor. The quest for trade is an incentive to men of business to devise, invent, improve, and economize in the cost of production. Business life, whether among ourselves, or with other peoples, is ever a sharp struggle for success. It will be none the less in the future. . . . Without competition we would be clinging to the clumsy and antiquated processes of farming and manufacture and the methods of business of long ago, and the twentieth would be no further advanced than the eighteenth century. But though commercial competitors we are, commercial enemies we must not be. The Pan-American Exposition has done its work thoroughly, presenting in its exhibits evidences of the highest skill and illustrating the progress of the human family in the Western Hemisphere. This portion of the earth has no cause for humiliation for the part it has performed in the march of civilization. It has not accomplished everything; far from it. It has simply done its best, and without vanity or boastfulness, and recognizing that manifold achievements of others it invites the friendly rivalry of all the powers in the peaceful pursuits of trade and commerce, and will coöperate with all in advancing the highest and best interests of humanity. The wisdom and energy of all the nations are none too great for the world work. The success of art, science, industry, and invention is an international asset and a common glory. . . .

My fellow-citizens, trade statistics indicate that this country is in a state of unexampled prosperity. The figures are almost appalling. They show that we are utilizing our fields and forests and mines, and that we are furnishing profitable employment to the millions of working-men throughout the United States, bringing comfort and happiness to their homes, and making it possible to lay by savings for old age and disability. That all the people are participating in this great prosperity is seen in every American community and shown by the enormous and unprecedented deposits in our savings-banks. Our duty in the care and security of these deposits and their safe investment demands the highest integrity and the best business capacity of those in charge of these depositories of the people's earnings. . . . We have a vast and intricate business, built up through years of toil and struggle in which every part of the country has its stake, which will not permit of neglect, nor of undue selfishness. No narrow, sordid policy will subvert it. The greatest skill and wisdom on the part of manufacturers and producers will be required to hold and increase it. Our industrial enterprises, which have grown to such great proportions, affect the homes and occupations of the people and the welfare of the country. Our capacity to produce has developed so enormously and our products have so multiplied that the problem of more markets requires our urgent and immediate attention. Only a broad and enlightened policy will keep what we have. No other policy will get more. In these times of marvelous business energy and gain we ought to be looking to the future, strengthening the weak places in our industrial and commercial systems, that we may be ready for any storm or strain. . . . By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers some of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established. . . . What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor. . . . The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good-will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not. If, perchance, some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad? Then, too, we have inadequate steamship service. New lines of steamships have already been put in commission between the Pacific coast ports of the United States and those on the western coasts of Mexico and Central and South America. These should be followed up with direct steamship lines between the western coast of the United States and South American ports. . . . We must build the Isthmian canal, which will unite the two oceans and give a straight line of water communication with the western coasts of Central and South America and Mexico. The construction of a Pacific cable can not be longer postponed. . . . Let us ever remember that our interest is in concord, not conflict; and that our real eminence rests in the victories of peace, not those of war. We hope that all who are represented here may be moved to higher and nobler effort for their own and the world's good, and that out of this city may come not only greater commerce and trade for us all, but, more essential than these, relations of mutual respect, confidence, and friendship which will deepen and endure. Our earnest prayer is that God will graciously vouchsafe prosperity, happiness, and peace to all our neighbors, and like blessings to all the peoples and powers of earth."

The next afternoon (Sept. 6) a reception was held in the Temple of Music, on the Exposition grounds, at which all who wished were invited to pass in line and shake hands with the President. In the line was a man whose right hand was wound about with a handkerchief. This concealed a revolver, and as the President offered his hand, turning it to accommodate the left hand of the stranger, the miscreant fired through the handkerchief and inflicted a slight flesh wound on the President's breast. Before the assassin could be knocked down or disarmed he fired a second bullet, which passed through the stomach. Surgical aid was close at hand, and very soon the wounded President was on the operating-table in the emergency hospital. The surgeons sewed up both wounds in the stomach, and as the shock appeared to be comparatively light Mr. McKinney was removed in the evening to the home of John G. Milburn, president of the Exposition. The patient progressed so rapidly toward apparent recovery that in five days he was pronounced out of danger; but the next day he showed signs of a relapse, and from that point he failed rapidly until he breathed his last 2:15 Saturday morning, Sept. 14. His bearing in that sorrowful week was in keeping with his whole life and character—courageous and charitable. When he was shot, fearing that the bystanders would take summary vengeance on the assassin, he exclaimed, "Let no one hurt him," and the only time that he inquired about the felon it was to be assured that he had not been lynched. When the surgeons announced to him that an operation was necessary, he said, "Gentlemen, I wish you to do whatever in your judgment is best." He was cheerful as he lay helpless during the days that followed, often speaking of his plans for the future. Forty-eight hours before the end came his physicians informed him what it must be. He took an affecting farewell of his wife, and then softly caressed portions of his favorite hymns—"Abide with me" and "Nearer, my God, to Thee." His last words were, "It is God's way—His will be done," and "Good-bye, all! Good-bye!" The story of his last hours, considered in connection with his character and the history of his life, reads like the close of some great Shakespearean drama.

The body was taken to Washington, where it lay in state in the Capitol, and thence to Canton, Ohio, where the funeral services were held on Thursday, Sept. 19—the twentieth anniversary of the death of President Garfield. The assassin had declared himself an anarchist, and when the President died it required a large force of militia as well as police to protect him from the crowd that surrounded the Buffalo jail.

The assassin was tried speedily, two eminent lawyers being assigned by the court for his defense, and was found guilty of murder in the first degree. On Sept. 26 he was sentenced to be executed by electricity in the week beginning Oct. 28—the earliest date permitted by law. He declared in court that he had no accomplices whatever.

A volume of Mr. McKinney's speeches, compiled by Joseph P. Smith, was published in New York in 1893, and a campaign life by Robert P. Porter in Cleveland in 1896.

McKinney: city (founded in 1846; named after Collin McKinney, an early settler); capital of Collin co., Tex. (for location of county, see map of Texas, ref. 2-1); near the east fork of Trinity river; on the Houston and Tex. Cent. and the Sherman, Shreve, and S. railways; 32 miles N. of Dallas, 135 miles N. E. of Austin. It is in an agricultural and cotton-growing region; contains 5 churches, McKinney Institute, a public-school building, and 4 weekly newspapers; and has a cotton-compress, cotton-oil mill, flour-mill, Maack'intosh, SIR JAMES, M. D., LL. D., F. R. S.; philosopher and politician; b. at Aldourie, Inverness-shire, Scotland, Oct. 24, 1765; graduated M. A. in 1784 at King's College, Aberdeen, and M. D. at Edinburgh 1787; went to London, and in 1791 published his Vindictive Galilee, an eloquent defense of the French Revolution against the strictures of Burke's Reflections, which at once won him the favor of the Whig leaders; supported himself by literary work, and in 1795 was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn; delivered in 1799-1800 at Lincoln's Inn his brilliant Lectures on the Law of Nature and of Nations; won a splendid fame at the bar; was knighted 1803, and was recorder of Bombay 1804-06; judge of admiralty 1806-11; returned to England after a highly honorable career in the East, and entered Parliament in 1813 from Nairn; was Professor of Law and General Politics at Haileybury College 1818-24, still taking an important place in parliamentary business; in 1830 became a commissioner of Indian affairs. D. in London, May 30, 1832. Among his more important works are a brief History of England (1830), extending only to the reign of Elizabeth, but completed by Wallace and Bell (10 vols.); a Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy (1830), written for the Encyclopaedia Britannica; a Life of Sir Thomas More; a posthumously published History of the Revolution in England in 1688, which was a fragment of a projected history in several volumes; and a great number of miscellaneous articles, chiefly published in The Edinburgh Review, containing a mass of valuable criticism, especially regarding questions of psychology and ethics. They were collected into volumes and published in the U. S. in a series entitled Modern British Essayists. As a parliamentary orator he did not fill the expectations based upon his forensic achievements, among which the memorable defense of Peltier (Feb. 21, 1803) was perhaps the greatest effort of British eloquence at the bar. See his Memoirs, by his son, containing journals, etc. (1835).

McLane, LOUIS: Congressman and diplomat; son of Col. Allen McLane (1746-1829), jurist; b. at Smyrna, Del., May 28, 1786; entered the navy as midshipman at the age of twelve years, and cruised a year in the Philadelphia; pursued studies at Newark College, Delaware; studied law with James A. Bayard, and was admitted to the bar 1807; served as a volunteer in 1814 in a company commanded by Caesar H. Rodney, which marched to the defense of Baltimore from the threatened attack by the British; was representative in Congress 1817-27, voting against the admission of slavery in Missouri or in the Territories; was chosen Senator 1827; served by President Jackson as minister to England May, 1829; returned in 1831 to accept the post of Secretary of the Treasury, was transferred in 1833 to the department of State in consequence of his refusal to sanction the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the U. S.; retired to private life June, 1834, settling in Maryland; was president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad during its completion and early management 1837-47; accepted the mission to London to settle the Oregon difficulty June, 1845; was a delegate to the constitutional convention of Maryland 1850-51. D. in Baltimore, Oct. 7, 1857.

McLane, ROBERT MILLIGAN: son of Louis McLane, diplomat; b. in Wilmington, Del., June 23, 1815; resided with his father in London 1828-31; studied in colleges in Baltimore, Md., and Paris, France; graduated at West Point Military Academy 1837; served in the army in Florida, in the Cherokee country, and in the Northwest; resigned 1843; was admitted to the bar in Baltimore the same year; was a member of the Maryland Legislature 1845-47; member of Congress 1847-51; commissioner to China 1853-55; and minister to Mexico. While in Mexico he negotiated a treaty giving President Juarez the benefit of a U. S. loan and other substantial advantages, and purchasing Lower California for a sum of several millions of dollars. The treaty was never ratified, but the policy of intervention in Mexican affairs was carried out by the U. S. navy in capturing several vessels of war belonging to the reactionary government of Miramon. After his return from Mexico he practiced at the Baltimore bar. He was a delegate to the national Democratic conventions of 1856 and 1876; member of the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses; Governor of Maryland 1884-85; U. S. minister to France 1885-89. D. April 16, 1898.

The trainshed of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Jersey City, N. J., has roof-trusses with a span of 252 feet, while its total length is 650½ feet. The roof of the St. Pancras Station in London is 690 feet long, with a span of 243 feet. The dimensions of the building for the exhibition of manufactures at the Columbian Exposition of 1893 in Chicago were 787 feet by 1,687 feet, and the main roof-trusses had a span of 368 feet.

Fig. 12.

Fig. 14 shows the iron framing of a mansard roof. These roofs (which have since their invention formed so common a feature of French architecture) of different styles, slopes, and coverings have been very generally adopted for many classes of buildings both in the city and in the country. They were at first built almost exclusively of wood and covered with slate, but the great liability to take and communicate fire has caused the use of iron and steel for framing purposes.

The coverings for roofs are made of various materials, among which may be mentioned the following: Thatch of straw, reeds, and heath, used probably in primitive times, and even in the present age, in rude dwellings; tiles of various shapes, which have been used from the Roman period to the present, and which probably covered the Saxon buildings; thin slabs of stone or flag; slate; lead, which was always used on mediæval roofs; tin, iron, zinc, copper; asphalted felt coated with a hot preparation of tar on which gravel is spread; shingles; canvas covered with cement and glass.

Fig. 14.

The principles governing the design of roof-trusses are similar to those for bridge-trusses, the main differences being in the data regarding snow and wind loads. The snow load is taken at various values, depending on climate, up to 15 or 20 lb. per square foot of horizontal area. The wind pressure on a vertical plane is taken at from 30 to 50 lb. per square foot. See the articles ARCH, BRIDGES, and STRESSES; also Greene's Graphical Analysis of Roof Trusses (1876); and Ricker's Construction of Trussed Roofs (1885).

ROOK [O. Eng. hrōc: O. H. Germ. hrōh: Icel. hrök: cf. Goth. hrakjan, to crow: Sanskr. krop, cry out, croak]: a bird (Corvus frugilegus) of the family Corvidæ, closely related to the common crow, which it also resembles nearly in size (it is a little smaller), as well as black color; but distinguished therefrom by the bill being little longer than the head, and in the adult naked at the base; the first primary is shorter than the eighth, the second shorter than the fifth, and the third and fourth are the longest. It is generally distributed throughout Europe and Eastern Asia. It lives in communities known as rookeries; these sometimes are very populous, occasionally containing from 2,000 to 3,000 nests, and a corresponding number of birds of different ages and sizes. In Great Britain they are considered by many an attractive feature in the landscape, and are therefore protected. The nests are generally made in tall trees. The female lays, early in the spring, about four or five greenish-blue and spotted eggs. The species is omnivorous, but does not trouble the farmer, like the crow. It is capable, like its congeners, of mimicking the sounds of other animals. The young are to some extent used as food in Great Britain and on the Continent.

ROON, rōn, ALBRECHT THEODOR EMIL, Count von: soldier; b. near Kolberg, Prussia, Apr. 30, 1803; entered the army in 1821; attended the military school of Berlin 1824-27; appointed teacher to the cadets in 1828, member of the topographical survey of the staff in 1833, teacher in the military school in 1835, and captain on the staff in 1836. In 1842 he was made a major, and subsequently took charge of the military instruction of Prince Frederick Charles. During the campaign in Baden he was chief of the staff of the Eighth Army-corps; was made a colonel in 1851, commander of the Twentieth Brigade of infantry in 1856, and commander of the Fourteenth Division at Düsseldorf in 1858. On Dec. 5, 1859, the prince-regent called him to take charge of the ministry of War, and (Apr. 16, 1861) also of the ministry of the Marine. After the war of 1866, which gave evidence of his talent for organization, he received from the king the cross of the Black Eagle and a dotation, and after the war with France (1870-71) he was made a count and received a new dotation. The office of Minister of the Marine he resigned Dec. 31, 1871. In the Prussian Government he represented a specific Prussian tendency in opposition to the policy of Prince Bismarck, and (Dec. 21, 1872), having handed in his resignation, he was made president of the cabinet, and a few days afterward field-marshal, but resigned in 1873. D. in Berlin, Feb. 23, 1879. See von Gossler, Graf Albrecht von Roon (Berlin, 1879).

ROOSA, D. B. SR. JOHN: See the Appendix.

ROOSEVELT, ROBERT BARNWELL: Congressman and author; b. in New York, Aug. 7, 1829; studied law, and was engaged in active practice for many years, but finally devoted himself to literature, rural sports, and politics, and in 1870 was elected to Congress; became president of the New York Sportsmen's Club; was one of the State commissioners of fisheries for many years; U. S. minister to the Netherlands 1888-89; edited The Citizen, a weekly journal devoted to literature and politics; published The Game Fish of North America (New York, 1860), The Game Birds of the Coast and Lakes of the Northern States (1866), and similar works; and edited, with a biographical sketch, The Poetical Works of Charles G. Halpine (1869).

ROOSEVELT, THEODORE, LL. D.: twenty-sixth President of the U. S.; b. in New York City, Oct. 27, 1858. His father, also named Theodore, a merchant and philanthropist, was of Knickerbocker stock, and his mother was a descendant of Archibald Bulloch, the first President of Georgia in the Revolution. He was prepared for college in private schools, and was graduated at Harvard in 1880. After traveling in Europe he began the study of law, but abandoned it for politics. In 1881 he was elected by the Republicans to the Assembly from the Twenty-first District of New York City, and he was twice re-elected. The first two Legislatures in which he sat were Democratic. In his second year he was leader of the minority in the Cities Committee, and he became its chairman in the Republican Legislature of 1884, after being an unsuccessful candidate for Speaker. He was active in promoting the passage of the first New York civil-service laws, was chairman of a committee that investigated abuses in New York City, and secured acts abolishing the fee system in county offices and depriving the aldermen of veto power over the mayor's appointments. He favored a bill reducing elevated-railroad fares, but when Gov. Cleveland vetoed it he sustained the veto. In 1884 he was a delegate at large to the Republican National Convention, where he advocated the nomination of George F. Edmunds, but he supported Mr. Blaine in the campaign. The Republicans nominated him for mayor of New York in 1885 against Henry George, the United Labor candidate, and Abraham S. Hewitt, the Democratic candidate, who was elected. President Harrison appointed him a civil-service commissioner in 1889. He served efficiently until May, 1895, when he resigned, and became president of the New York City Board of Police Commissioners in the administration of Mayor Strong. He established a policy of strict enforcement of liquor and Sunday laws, which aroused much opposition.

Mr. Roosevelt was appointed Assistant Secretary of the Navy in April, 1897, and took an important part in the preparations for the Spanish War. At the outbreak of hostilities he resigned his office and raised, largely among the Western cowboys, a regiment of volunteer cavalry, who were popularly known as Rough Riders. He became lieutenant-colonel, with Dr. Leonard Wood, of the regular army, in command. From 1884 to 1888 he had been a member of the Eighth Regiment, National Guard of New York. The Rough Riders (unmounted) were with the army before Santiago, and took part in the fight at Las Guasimas, June 24, 1898, and in the capture of San Juan Hill on July 1. Col. Wood was promoted brigadier-general on July 8, and Lieut.-Col. Roosevelt became colonel. He was mentioned in the reports for gallant conduct in battle, and was distinguished for care of his men in camp.

Col. Roosevelt returned with his regiment to Montauk Point in August, 1898, was nominated for Governor of New York by the Republicans at Saratoga, Sept. 27, 1898, and was elected for the two years' term beginning Jan. 1, 1899, by a plurality of 17,786 over Augustus Van Wyck, Democrat. As Governor he reformed the administration of the canals, favored the enactment of an improved civil-service law, and applied the merit system in county offices. By a special message he induced the Legislature of 1899, at the end of the session, to pass an act taxing as real estate the value of railroad and other franchises to use public streets. Corporations and Republican leaders protested, but the Governor said he would sign it as it stood unless they could improve it without destroying its essential features. He called an extra session, secured the passage of the bill in modified form, and established the principle of street-franchise taxation.

Columbia University made Gov. Roosevelt a doctor of laws in 1899. Early in 1900 he was mentioned for Vice-President, but he desired a second term as Governor, and repeatedly announced that under no circumstances would he accept the vice-presidency. But New York party leaders joined Western delegates who were enthusiastic over Gov. Roosevelt's military record, and at the Philadelphia convention on June 21, 1900, forced him to accept the nomination for Vice-President. He made an extended speaking tour through the Western States, and was elected for the term beginning March 4, 1901, receiving 292 electoral votes, while 155 were cast for Adlai E. Stevenson, the Democratic candidate.

After the assassination of President McKinley, Sept. 6, 1901, the Vice-President hurried to Buffalo, but he left the city upon the apparent assurance of the President's recovery. He returned upon the news of President McKinley's death, Sept. 14, 1901, and on the afternoon of the same day, at the residence of Mr. Ansley Wilcox, in Buffalo, took the oath as President of the U. S. He outlined his policy in these words, spoken to the cabinet members and a few friends gathered for the occasion: "In this hour of national peril and sorrow I will say that it is my purpose to continue unbroken the policies of President McKinley for the peace, prosperity, and honor of the United States."

In 1882 he published a Naval History of 1812. This was followed by Hunting Trips of a Ranchman, in 1885; a Life of Thomas H. Benton in 1886, and a Life of Gouverneur Morris in 1887, both in the American Statesmen Series; and in 1888 by Essays in Practical Politics and Ranch Life and Hunting Trail. The first two volumes of his most important work, The Winning of the West, were issued in 1889. In 1890 he wrote a History of New York City for the Historic Towns Series; in 1893, The Wilderness Hunter; and the next year published the third volume of The Winning of the West. In 1897 he collected a volume of essays entitled American Ideals, which he followed with The Rough Riders in 1899, and Oliver Cromwell and a volume of addresses entitled The Strenuous Life, in 1900. He is also the author, in collaboration with Henry Cabot Lodge, of Hero Tales from American History, and he was one of the assistants of William Laird Clowes in the preparation of The Royal Navy.

Ropes and Rope-making [rope is from O. Eng. rāp, rope; O. H. Germ. reif, cord, circular band > Mod. Germ. reif, hoop, circular band]: Rope is a general name of the stouter forms of cordage, and especially of those whose circumference exceeds an inch. They are generally made of hemp, which is first hackled or combed out to remove the dust and tow. The hackle consists of a strong board with long vertical steel prongs sharply pointed and polished. The backing is done by hand.

The preparation machines hackle the hemp still finer for spinning into yarn. The first of these is the spreader, a machine having two endless chains fitted with gill-bars and gill-pins (steel teeth), which combs or straightens out and evens the fibers. Its spreader is fed with the hackled hemp at one end, which it throws out in a sliver from the other.

From the spreader the sliver is passed through two or more drawing-frames, by which it is drawn down still more and the fibers still further combed out straight, the size of the sliver being reduced at each step. The drawing-frame is similar to the spreader, but has only one chain. The sliver is then passed to the spinner, where it is spun into yarn, and at the same time reeled upon a bobbin. An improvement in the spinner, the invention of John Good, of Brooklyn, N. Y., tubes the yarn, rendering it smoother and more even than any process yet devised. The yarn is spun right-handed. The size of the yarn varies according to the kind of rope for which it is intended. Forties—so called because forty yarns will just fill a half-inch tube—are for the finer kinds of rope; twenties, requiring twenty to fill the tube, are for cables, hawsers, etc. From the spinning-room the bobbins containing the yarn are taken to the tar-house, where they are placed in frames conveniently arranged with reference to the tar-box. This is a long box filled with tar kept during the operation of tarring at a temperature of 220° F. by means of steam-heaters. The yarns are led from the bobbins in the frame through two or more guide-plates working in a vertical plane over the tar-box, and convenient for lowering into the tar; thence to the further end between metal rollers, which press out and return to the box the superfluous tar, on to a large wooden drum to cool them; through fair-lead-ers, and finally to a fresh set of bobbins, where they are wound up with the utmost regularity. The bobbins containing the tarred yarn go to the laying-ground, where they are placed in frames, when the yarns are ready for hauling down, or making into strands. The laying-ground, where the rope is laid up, occupies the entire length of the ropewalk. The yarns for the strands, generally three in number, are led from the bobbins in the frame through holes bored on concentric circles in a metallic plate, thence through a tube adapted to the size of the strand, and attached to a hook on the end of a spindle in a movable machine like a car, called the former. There are a plate, a tube, and a hook for each strand, and the number of yarns to a strand is regulated by the size of the intended rope. When the machinery is put in motion, the former is drawn down the walk, and the yarns as they are hauled through the tubes are formed into left-handed strands. Closing the strands is the next step, for which two machines are used. The lower one—the layer—lays up or closes the rope, and is movable; the upper one, which keeps the proper twist in the strand while laying, is stationary. Each strand being secured to its proper spindle, the machinery is put in motion and the strands hardened. A press attached to the layer prevents too much drawing up, as the strands shorten in by the additional twisting. After hardening, the strands are placed together on a central spindle of the layer and closed, a top inserted between them preventing too rapid closing. The top is a wooden cone with grooves cut to hold the strands, while tails of soft rope attached to it, by being applied to the rope as it is made, still further prevent, by the additional friction, the too rapid closing of the strands. The layer makes two revolutions to one of the upper machine. The skill of the rope-maker consists in knowing how to gear his preparation machines so as to draw a clean and uniform sliver, in giving the proper degree of twist to the yarn and strand, the amount of hardening, and the speed of the top in closing. The foregoing process gives right-handed tarred rope of three strands (plain laid). By not tarring the yarns white rope is produced. This is the strong-
